InSight Bulletin: A Multidisciplinary Interlink International Research Journal
Peer Reviewed International, Open Access Journal.
ISSN : 3065-7857 / Website: https://ibrj.us / Volume-2, Issue-12 / December - 2025

Original Article

Reimagining Indian Culture and Heritage in Contemporary Indian English Fiction

Rajshree Sachin Akhade
Asst. Professor in English,Jai Hind Educational Trust's
Zulal Bhilajirao Patil College Dhule

Manuscript ID:
IBMIIRJ -2025-021232

Submitted: 10 Nov. 2025

Revised: 15 Nov. 2025

Accepted: 20 Dec. 2025

Published: 31 Dec. 2025

ISSN: 3065-7857

Volume-2

Issue-12

Pp. 157-161

December 2025

Correspondence Address:
Rajshree Sachin Akhade
Asst. Professor in English,Jai Hind Educational Trust's Zulal Bhilajirao Patil College Dhule

OPEN ACCESS

Quick Response Code:

Web. https://ibrj.us

DOI: 10.5281/zenodo.23724702

DOI Link:
https://doi.org/10.5281/zenodo.23724702

Creative Commons

Abstract:

This study examines how contemporary Indian English fiction presents and rethinks Indian culture and heritage. It focuses on four novels: Chitra Banerjee Divakaruni's The Palace of Illusions, Amitav Ghosh's Sea of Poppies and The Glass Palace, and Kiran Desai's The Inheritance of Loss. The discussion considers mythology, gender, caste, colonial rule, migration, regional identity, and cultural memory. These novels revisit stories and historical events and show how social change affects people and communities. Each novel presents Indian identity from a different angle, rather than as one experience. Through their characters and settings, the writers show how heritage connects people with the past while encouraging readers to question old beliefs and unfair social practices. The study highlights how literature helps us understand changing cultural identities today.

Keywords: Indian English fiction, Indian culture, cultural heritage, mythology, colonialism, cultural identity

Introduction:

Contemporary Indian English fiction presents different ways of writing about India, its past, and its changing society. In Writing India Anew: Indian English Fiction 2000–2010, Krishna Sen and Rituparna Roy bring together studies of Indian English fiction published during the first decade of the twenty-first century. The book discusses different literary approaches to the nation, history, the present, and home. Its contents include the rewriting of India, the use of mythology and history, and changes in the representation of Indian life. This work provides a direct starting point for studying how contemporary fiction presents Indian culture and heritage.

The rewriting of India's past is an important part of this literary discussion. Bill Ashcroft's chapter "Re-writing India," included in the same book, examines the changing representation of India through contemporary fiction. The chapter discusses the relationship between Indian writing and ideas of the nation. It also considers how novels challenge established ways of imagining India. This approach is useful for the present study because cultural heritage in fiction can be examined through the ways writers represent history, national identity, and inherited ideas. The focus should remain on the literary texts and the arguments made by the critics, rather than assuming that all writers understand Indian culture in the same way.

Meenakshi Mukherjee's The Perishable Empire: Essays on Indian Writing in English provides another relevant background. According to Oxford University Press, the book examines the nineteenth-century beginnings of Indian writing in English and its later development in relation to other Indian-language literatures. This perspective is important when studying Indian English fiction because it places English-language writing within India's wider literary history. Kanak Lata Tiwari's article, "Identity Crisis—Indian English Fiction of Post 1980s," also examines identity in Indian English fiction and discusses the related ideas of history, culture, religion, nation, and nationalism. These sources provide a basis for examining the relationship between literary representation, cultural identity, and historical change.

The present study, "Reimagining Indian Culture and Heritage in Contemporary Indian English Fiction," will examine how selected novels represent India's past, cultural traditions, historical memories, and changing identities.

Creative Commons (CC BY-NC-SA 4.0)
This is an open access journal, and articles are distributed under the terms of the Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-ShareAlike 4.0 International Public License, which allows others to remix, tweak, and build upon the work noncommercially, as long as appropriate credit is given and the new creations ae licensed under the idential terms.

How to cite this article:
Akhade, R. S. (2025). Reimagining Indian Culture and Heritage in Contemporary Indian English Fiction. InSight Bulletin: A Multidisciplinary Interlink International Research Journal, 2(12), 157–161. https://doi.org/10.5281/zenodo.23724702

It will study the ways writer's present inherited beliefs and practices, and how their literary treatment relates to social and historical changes. The study will not assume that every novel represents culture positively or that all writers present the same view of heritage. Instead, it will examine the selected texts closely and connect each interpretation with relevant literary evidence. In this way, the study aims to understand how contemporary Indian English fiction revisits the past and presents different ways of understanding Indian culture and heritage.

Significance of the Study

Indian English fiction presents different views of Indian culture, history, and society. The study of reimagining Indian culture and heritage in contemporary Indian English fiction is important because it helps us understand how writers present the past in changing times. Sen and Roy's Writing India Anew: Indian English Fiction 2000–2010 discusses contemporary fiction and its treatment of history, mythology, and India. This provides a useful background for the present study. The study will examine how selected novels present cultural traditions, historical memories, and Indian identity. It will also consider how writers question old beliefs and show changes in social life. This study will be useful for students and researchers who want to understand the relationship between literature, culture, and heritage. It will also help readers see that Indian culture is not the same everywhere and that writers present it in different ways. The study will therefore support a better understanding of Indian English fiction.

Review of Literature

Krishna Sen and Rituparna Roy, in their edited book Writing India Anew: Indian English Fiction 2000–2010 (2013), discusses Indian English fiction published during the first decade of the twenty-first century. The book includes discussions of mythology, history, and the changing image of India. It provides a useful starting point for understanding how writers present India and its past in new ways. Bill Ashcroft, in his chapter "Re-writing India," examines how contemporary fiction presents India and questions established ideas about the nation. E. Dawson Varughese, in the article "Post-millennial 'Indian Fantasy' Fiction in English and the Question of Mythology: Writing beyond the 'Usual Suspects'" (2019), studies Vikram Balagopal's Savage Blue and Sukanya Venkatraghavan's Dark Things. The article discusses how these novels use Indian fantasy without placing Hindu mythology at the center of every story. It also examines the relationship between fantasy, Indian identity, and popular imagination. João Pedro Oliveira, in his 2024 article "The Progressive Pilgrim: Real and Mythical Indian Geography in Contemporary Retellings of the Rāmāyaṇa," studies modern English retellings of the Rāmāyaṇa. The article explains how these retellings connect places from mythology with real Indian geography and ideas of the nation.

Jagdish Batra, in "Religion and Spirituality in Indian English Fiction" (2020), discusses religion, dharma, myths, scriptures, and spiritual experiences in Indian English fiction. His article also considers how writers present religious beliefs and spiritual life in different ways.

These studies provide useful background for understanding the representation of mythology, religion, history, and Indian identity in fiction. The present study will examine selected novels to understand how writers present Indian culture and heritage, and how they preserve, question, or reshape traditional ideas through their stories and characters

Objectives of the Study

1. To study Indian culture and heritage in selected contemporary Indian English novels.
2. To examine Indian myths, traditions, and historical memories presented in selected novels.
3. To understand the changing cultural identity and social values presented in contemporary Indian English fiction.
4. To examine the preservation and reinterpretation of Indian cultural traditions and heritage in selected novels.

Discussion:

Rewriting Myth, Gender, and Cultural Memory in The Palace of Illusions

Indian culture and heritage have been preserved through stories, religious traditions, family customs, and memories of the past. These traditions connect one generation with another and help people understand their history. However, the meaning of an old story can change when it is told from a different point of view. Chitra Banerjee Divakaruni's The Palace of Illusions (2008) is a good example of this kind of retelling. The novel presents the story of the Mahabharata through Draupadi's eyes. In many familiar versions of the epic, the main attention is given to the Pandavas, their struggles, and the war between the two sides of the family. Divakaruni brings Draupadi's life and thoughts to the centre of the story. In doing so, she invites readers to look at a well-known part of Indian heritage in a new way.

Draupadi is not presented simply as a wife who follows the wishes of others. She has her own thoughts, ambitions, questions, and feelings. She tries to understand the people around her and the events that shape her life. Her experiences show that women in traditional stories also have personal hopes and fears, even when the larger story gives more attention to male characters. By allowing Draupadi to tell her story, Divakaruni gives readers an opportunity to see familiar events from a woman's point of view. This change does not remove the novel from its connection with the Mahabharata. Rather, it brings out aspects of the story that may receive less attention in other tellings. Ana García-Arroyo's study of the novel also examines how Divakaruni's retelling questions established ideas about women and patriarchal power (García-Arroyo). This critical reading is relevant because it shows that retelling a traditional story can also raise questions about the way women have been represented.

The novel also draws attention to the position of women within traditional social structures. Draupadi's life is influenced by marriage, family duties, political interests, and the expectations of powerful men. Although she is intelligent and strong-minded, she cannot always make decisions freely.

Another important aspect of the novel is its treatment of memory. The Mahabharata has been passed down through generations and remains an important part of Indian cultural memory. Yet people may understand the same story differently according to their experiences and beliefs. When Draupadi tells her story, familiar events take on a more personal meaning. Readers are encouraged to think about not only what happened but also how the people involved felt and understood those events.

Caste, Migration, and Colonial Economy in Sea of Poppies

Amitav Ghosh's Sea of Poppies (2008) presents Indian society during the nineteenth century, when British colonial rule had a strong influence on agriculture, trade, labour, and migration. The novel brings together people from different social backgrounds and shows how their lives become connected through the colonial economy. Its importance lies not only in its historical setting but also in its attention to the lives of ordinary people. Through their experiences, Ghosh shows how caste, class, gender, and economic power affect personal choices. The novel also makes clear that history is not shaped only by rulers and wealthy people. The lives of farmers, workers, women, and migrants are also an important part of the past.

Deeti's story is especially important in the novel's treatment of caste. She belongs to a high-caste family, but her life is shaped by marriage, family expectations, and the social rules around her. Her relationship with Kalua, a man treated as an untouchable, challenges the boundaries created by caste. Their relationship brings attention to the way caste can influence marriage, family life, and social acceptance. It also questions the belief that a person's caste should decide that person's value or place in society. Through Deeti and Kalua, Ghosh shows that caste is not merely an idea discussed in religious or social terms. It affects people's everyday lives and can limit their freedom to form relationships and make decisions. Omendra Kumar Singh's study of Sea of Poppies examines caste in relation to migration and the Indian diaspora (Singh). His work provides a useful critical background for understanding how caste identities are challenged and carried into new social situations in the novel.

The novel also shows how colonial economic policies affected Indian farmers and workers. Poppy cultivation and the opium trade connect village life with larger commercial interests. Farmers do not always have the freedom to decide what they will grow or how they will use their land. Their economic choices are influenced by a system that serves the interests of colonial trade. As a result, colonial power enters everyday life through work, debt, and the struggle to support a family.

Migration is another major theme in Sea of Poppies. The ship Ibis brings together people who come from different social backgrounds and who have different reasons for leaving their homes. For some, the journey is connected with work and the hope of a better future. For others, it is linked with difficult circumstances and limited choices. The journey across the sea has a meaning beyond travelling from one place to another. The idea of kala-pani carries social and cultural concerns about separation from home, family, and familiar customs. Leaving one's place of origin can also mean facing an uncertain future in which earlier social relationships may change.

Life aboard the ship brings people into contact with others whom they might not have met as equals in their earlier lives. Established divisions of caste and social position come under pressure as the passengers share the same space and depend on one another. However, this does not mean that all differences disappear. People may continue to carry their old beliefs and prejudices even when they enter a new environment. At the same time, shared difficulties can create new relationships and a sense of common experience.

The novel shows that culture is shaped not only by customs and beliefs but also by land, labour, family relationships, and economic conditions. Through its characters, it presents the past as a complex human experience and encourages readers to consider how social divisions and colonial power affected the lives of ordinary people.

Colonial Conquest and Cultural Memory in The Glass Palace

Amitav Ghosh's The Glass Palace (2000) explores the effects of British colonial expansion through the connected histories of Burma, India, and Malaya. The novel begins during the British invasion of Burma and follows characters whose lives change because of political events, economic opportunities, and migration. Its wide historical setting allows Ghosh to show how colonial rule affected both public life and personal relationships. The novel is important to the study of culture and heritage because it connects people's identities with their homes, memories, and experiences of historical change.

The British invasion of Burma and the removal of its royal family show how colonial conquest can disturb a society's political and cultural life. The royal family is not simply a group of individuals who lose their position. It is also connected with the history and identity of the kingdom. Its removal therefore represents a wider change in the relationship between the people, their rulers, and their land..

The novel does not, however, present every character as having the same experience of colonial rule. Some people find opportunities within the colonial system, while others suffer from its unequal structure. Their choices depend on their work, education, family responsibilities, and hopes for the future. This makes the novel's treatment of colonial history more complex. People may benefit from a particular institution at one stage of their lives and later discover the limits of their position within it. The colonial system offers opportunities to some, but those opportunities exist within a larger structure of unequal power.

The experiences of Indian soldiers provide a clear example of this conflict. Arjun and other Indian soldiers serve in the British Indian Army. Their training gives them a sense of discipline and professional identity, and they see themselves as members of an organised military institution. Yet their service also raises questions about loyalty and belonging. They must face the difference between their identity as soldiers and the purpose for which the army is used. Their experiences show how colonial institutions can influence the way people understand themselves. They also reveal the difficulty of serving a system when its interests may conflict with one's own society. Binayak Roy's study of The Glass Palace discusses colonial power, insecurity, and resistance in the novel (Roy). This provides a useful critical perspective on the characters' position within the empire.

Family memories help the characters maintain a connection with their past. Memories of earlier homes, family relationships, and social customs remain important even after people move elsewhere. However, these memories cannot bring back a world that has changed. The characters must find ways to live with their inherited identities while responding to new circumstances. This creates a tension between continuity and change. Their past remains part of who they are, but it does not determine every decision they make.

The Glass Palace presents colonial history through the lives of people who experience its effects in different ways. It shows that political events are connected with family life, work, identity, and memory..

Colonial Attitudes, Migration, and Regional Identity in The Inheritance of Loss

Kiran Desai's The Inheritance of Loss (2006) examines the effects of colonialism through the lives of people in Kalimpong, India, and New York, America. The novel deals with identity, class, migration, and the desire to find a place where one feels accepted. Rather than presenting heritage only through old traditions or major historical events, Desai shows how the colonial past continues to affect people's daily lives. It influences the way they speak, behave, judge others, and think about success. The novel suggests that political independence does not automatically remove the mental and social effects of colonial rule.

Jemubhai Patel, the retired judge, is an important example of how colonial attitudes can shape personal identity. His education and experience in Britain change the way he looks at himself and others. He begins to associate British manners and habits with social respect and success. At the same time, he becomes uncomfortable with parts of his Indian background. His experience shows that colonial influence can continue through ideas about language, education, appearance, and social position even after British rule has ended. Jemubhai's life becomes a struggle between the place from which he comes and the identity he tries to build. His attempt to distance himself from his background does not bring him peace or a secure sense of belonging. Instead, it creates distance between him and the society around him.

Biju's experience of migration presents a different side of the same problem. He travels to New York hoping to improve his life, but the reality is much harder than he expects. He works in restaurant kitchens and struggles to find security. New York is often associated with wealth and opportunity, but Biju discovers that not everyone who lives there can enjoy those benefits. His position as a migrant limits his choices, and the work available to him does not provide the future he had imagined. Through Biju, Desai questions the belief that going abroad automatically leads to success.

The experiences of Jemubhai and Biju are different, but both reveal the difficulties of finding a secure identity in another place. Jemubhai travels to Britain for education and returns to India with ideas about status that distance him from his own background. Biju travels to America in search of economic improvement but finds that he remains on the margins of society. Their stories show that living abroad does not automatically remove social problems or provide a sense of belonging. The opportunities available to migrants depend on their position, resources, and circumstances. Desai does not suggest that every migrant has the same experience. Instead, she shows that migration can bring hope as well as disappointment.

Regional identity is another important part of the novel. The political tensions in the Darjeeling hills reflect the Gorkha movement and demands for recognition and a separate political identity. These events show that India contains different regional histories, languages, and cultural experiences.

The relationship between generations also matters in the novel. Sai grows up in circumstances different from those of Jemubhai, and her experiences shape her understanding of the world. The differences between them show that beliefs are not passed from one generation to the next without change. Younger people may question the attitudes of older family members, but they are still affected by family history and social conditions. Cultural identity develops through this relationship between what people inherit and what they experience for themselves.

The Inheritance of Loss presents heritage as something that affects people in their everyday lives. Colonial attitudes, economic inequality, migration, and regional politics all influence the way the characters understand themselves and others. The novel does not suggest that people can solve every problem simply by returning to their roots. Nor does it accept the idea that Western culture is naturally superior. Instead, it shows the difficulties of living between different cultural expectations..

Comparative Assessment: Culture, Heritage, and Social Change

The four novels deal with different periods and aspects of Indian cultural experience, but they share a concern with the relationship between the past and the present. The Palace of Illusions returns to an ancient epic and tells the story through Draupadi's experiences. Sea of Poppies examines caste, colonial agriculture, and migration in the nineteenth century. The Glass Palace explores colonial conquest and the lives of people moving across Burma, India, and Malaya. The Inheritance of Loss looks at colonial attitudes, migration, and regional identity in a later period. Together, these novels show that Indian culture and heritage cannot be understood through one story or one historical experience.

One common feature is their examination of power. Divakaruni questions the way women are represented within a traditional epic. Ghosh shows how caste, colonial economic interests, and military institutions affect people's lives. Desai examines the influence of colonial ideas on people who judge themselves and others according to standards of status and respectability. These writers do not simply reject Indian traditions or suggest that every inherited practice is harmful.

Another similarity is the attention given to ordinary human experiences. Draupadi's thoughts bring personal feelings into a familiar epic. Deeti and Kalua's relationship shows the effects of caste and social restrictions. The soldiers and migrant families in The Glass Palace experience the consequences of colonial rule through their work, relationships, and movement between countries. Biju's life in New York shows the gap between the promise of migration and the difficulties faced by a migrant worker. These examples remind readers that history is not only about rulers, battles, and political decisions. It is also about people who must live with the consequences of those events.

Migration connects the novels in different ways. In Sea of Poppies, the movement of people across the sea is linked with colonial labour and changes in social relationships. In The Glass Palace, migration connects people across several Asian regions and changes their family and working lives. In The Inheritance of Loss, movement to Britain and America raises questions about class, opportunity, and belonging. These novels show that leaving one place for another can change a person's relationship with family, language, and community. However, migration does not necessarily remove old prejudices or make social inequality disappear. People may carry earlier beliefs into new places, while new experiences may also lead them to question those beliefs.

The novels also show that Indian culture is not uniform. It includes different languages, regions, traditions, social groups, and historical experiences. The four works do not represent every part of Indian society, and they should not be treated as complete accounts of Indian culture. Each novel offers a particular view of the relationship between identity and social change.

These novels also show that reimagining heritage does not mean changing the past without reason. It means returning to familiar stories and historical experiences, examining them carefully, and considering whose voices have been heard. Divakaruni gives Draupadi a central voice in the retelling of the Mahabharata. Ghosh brings attention to people affected by colonial power and social divisions. Desai shows how colonial attitudes continue to influence people long after the end of British rule.

In conclusion, The Palace of Illusions, Sea of Poppies, The Glass Palace, and The Inheritance of Loss present Indian culture and heritage as experiences that continue to change. They show that traditions can give people a sense of identity and connection with the past, but inherited beliefs and practices can also be questioned when they support inequality.

Conclusion:

The four novels discussed in this study show that contemporary Indian English fiction presents Indian culture and heritage in many ways. In The Palace of Illusions, Chitra Banerjee Divakaruni retells the Mahabharata through Draupadi's experiences and gives more space to a woman's voice. In Sea of Poppies, Amitav Ghosh writes about caste, colonial trade, and people moving across the sea. The Glass Palace shows how colonial conquest, military service, and migration shape people's lives and memories. In The Inheritance of Loss, Kiran Desai explores colonial attitudes, migration, and regional identity. These stories connect historical changes with people's everyday lives.

Together, the novels show that Indian culture is not fixed and is not experienced in the same way by everyone. It includes many histories, beliefs, languages, and social experiences. The writers do not simply repeat the past; they look at it again and invite readers to ask whose voices are heard and how traditions affect people's lives. Their characters show how caste, gender, colonial power, and economic inequality can limit choices and shape a person's sense of belonging. Cultural memory and family ties can help people understand their roots. This study concludes that heritage can remain meaningful even when people question older beliefs and understand traditions in new ways. These novels connect the past with present concerns and help readers see Indian identity as diverse, changing, and shaped by human experience.

Acknowledgement

The author sincerely acknowledges the valuable contributions of scholars, researchers, and literary critics whose works have enriched this study. Their insights into Indian culture, heritage, and contemporary Indian English fiction have provided a meaningful foundation for exploring the representation and reinterpretation of India's cultural identity and traditions in modern literature.

Financial support and sponsorship

Nil.

Conflicts of interest

The authors declare that there are no conflicts of interest regarding the publication of thesis paper.

References

1. Sen, Krishna, and Rituparna Roy, editors. Writing India Anew: Indian English Fiction 2000–2010. Amsterdam University Press, 2013. DOI: 10.2307/j.ctt45kd51.
2. Ashcroft, Bill. "Re-writing India." Writing India Anew: Indian English Fiction 2000–2010, edited by Krishna Sen and Rituparna Roy, Amsterdam University Press, 2013, pp. 29–46.
3. Mukherjee, Meenakshi. The Perishable Empire: Essays on Indian Writing in English. Oxford University Press, 2002. ISBN: 9780195662702.
4. Tiwari, Kanak Lata. "Identity Crisis—Indian English Fiction of Post 1980s." International Journal of English and Literature, vol. 4, no. 1, 2013, pp. 6–10. DOI: 10.5897/IJEL12.067
5. Sen, Krishna, and Rituparna Roy, editors. Writing India Anew: Indian English Fiction 2000–2010. Amsterdam University Press, 2013. Book record and contents.
6. Ashcroft, Bill. "Re-writing India." Writing India Anew: Indian English Fiction 2000–2010, edited by Krishna Sen and Rituparna Roy, Amsterdam University Press, 2013, pp. 29–46.
7. Varughese, E. Dawson. "Post-millennial 'Indian Fantasy' Fiction in English and the Question of Mythology: Writing beyond the 'Usual Suspects'." The Journal of Commonwealth Literature, vol. 54, no. 3, 2019, pp. 460–474. DOI: 10.1177/0021989417738282.
8. Oliveira, João Pedro. "The Progressive Pilgrim: Real and Mythical Indian Geography in Contemporary Retellings of the Rāmāyaṇa." Nations and Nationalism, vol. 30, no. 4, 2024, pp. 719–734. DOI: 10.1111/nana.13014.
9. Batra, Jagdish. "Religion and Spirituality in Indian English Fiction." IUP Journal of English Studies, vol. 15, no. 2, 2020, pp. 1–11.
10. Divakaruni, Chitra Banerjee. The Palace of Illusions. 2008.
11. García-Arroyo, Ana. "A Deconstruction of the Mahabharata: When Draupadi Writes Back." Miscelánea: A Journal of English and American Studies, vol. 58, 2018, pp. 13–29.
12. Ghosh, Amitav. Sea of Poppies. 2008.
13. Singh, Omendra Kumar. "Reinventing Caste: Indian Diaspora in Amitav Ghosh's Sea of Poppies." Asiatic: IIUM Journal of English Language and Literature, vol. 6, no. 1, 2012, pp. 47–62.
14. Roy, Binayak. "'Not at Home in Empire': Precarity, Fragility, and Resistance in Amitav Ghosh's The Glass Palace." Journal of Global Postcolonial Studies.
15. Desai, Kiran. The Inheritance of Loss. 2006.
16. Nanda, Aparajita. "Of Cityscapes, Affect and Migrant Subjectivities in Kiran Desai's Inheritance of Loss." Subjectivity, vol. 14, 2021, pp. 119–132.